WHEREAS, Lurline grew up in North Philadelphia in a strict Christian household, raised by a single-mother Mary Nixon, a domestic worker from the Eastern Shore of Maryland, after her father passed when she was 10 years old. WHEREAS, Lurline continued her basketball career as she entered Morgan State University in the early 1960s, during the modern Civil Rights movement. In 1963, she was jailed with hundreds of other Morgan students after protesting the segregation policy at a nearby movie theater; and

WHEREAS, After graduation, Jones moved back to Philadelphia and took a coaching job at the new University City High School, taking pointers from other legendary coaches at the time including Temple’s John Chaney and Cheyney State’s C. Vivian Stringer, she took the U-City Jaguars from an abysmal 0-13 record, to winning consecutive public league championships in 1978 and 1979; and

WHEREAS, Upset that the girls' basketball teams were excluded from the Citywide championships between public and Catholic schools, she filed a lawsuit under Title IX of the Civil Rights Act against the school district and the Archdiocese of Philadelphia, becoming its lead plaintiff; and

WHEREAS, Though she was sometimes ridiculed for bringing the lawsuit, she continued coaching - and winning at University City High. After 33 years, winning 647 games and 12 city championships, she retired in 2007, leaving retirement to coach girls' basketball, first at Germantown High School and then at Martin Luther King High School in West Oak Lane, where she still serves as a mentor today; and

WHEREAS, Lurline was honored by Senator Bob Casey in Washington D.C. during Black History Month in 2024 as a civil rights trailblazer and powerhouse basketball coach and mentor; and

WHEREAS, Lurline still works with young people, continuing to empower them to pursue their dreams of going to college and fighting for equity of treatment for women's sports; now, therefore, be it
